

The second equation calculates the specific metal removal rate and involves calculating half of the diameter, this is due to it being a cylindrical grinding process, and multiplying by the in feed rate to give the specific amount of the metal taken off the workpiece in one pass. The units for the specific metal removal rate is  $\text{mm}^2 \cdot \text{s}^{-1}$ . This is derived from the in feed rate being measured in mm per second ( $\text{mm} \cdot \text{s}^{-1}$ ) as it is essentially a distance travelled in a time period. This, when multiplied by the initial workpiece diameter, the only other variable with a unit, gives  $\text{mm}^2 \cdot \text{s}^{-1}$ .

$$\text{Specific Metal Removal Rate} = \frac{P_i}{2} \times \text{Initial Workpiece Diameter} \times \text{In Feed Rate}$$

Equation 4.2 Specific Metal Removal Rate.

The final equation uses the two previous equations and divides the first by the second to give the critical specific energy. Essentially it is the power used to remove a specific amount of the workpiece. Taking the units derived for the first equation and putting Watts into its derivative of  $\text{J} \cdot \text{s}^{-1}$  gives the units of specific grinding power as  $\text{J} \cdot \text{mm}^{-1} \cdot \text{s}^{-1}$ . Using the improved units for specific grinding power and  $\text{mm}^2 \cdot \text{s}^{-1}$  for the specific metal removal rate, the units for the critical specific energy can be derived. This is shown in detail in equation 4.4.

$$\text{Experimental Critical Specific Energy} = \frac{\text{Specific Grinding Power}}{\text{Specific Metal Removal Rate}}$$

Equation 4.3 Experimental Critical Specific Energy.

$$\frac{\text{J}}{\text{mm} \times \text{s}} \div \frac{\text{mm}^2}{\text{s}} \equiv \frac{\text{J}}{\text{mm} \times \text{s}} \times \frac{\text{s}}{\text{mm}^2} \equiv \frac{\text{J} \times \text{s}}{\text{mm} \times \text{s} \times \text{mm}^2} \equiv \frac{\text{J}}{\text{mm}^3}$$
